Marguerite Hobert, the Famous Soprano who sings "Micaela," in Carmen, Grand Opera House, Monday, November 16.

NEW YORK GRAND OPERA COMPANY IN CARMEN

Paul Poiret's last word on fashions—his last interview before he made what will be a memorable epigram. "France has no need for artists when her army calls," and marched away to the front with his regiment—reveals that the constructive dress influence of the day tends to the inevitably treasured woman. Ten years he gives the skirt, long or short, fuller clinging; then take graduation of woman to the freedom of dress envied of man for centuries.

Yvonne Darle, the most beautiful Carmen on the operatic stage, who will be here with the New York Grand Opera company at the Grand Opera House on Monday night, November 16, has known the poet, philosopher and designer of gowns for several years. She met him late last summer at the threshold of his atelier in Paris, to receive the special gowns he was designing for her departure to fight for France. His attention was at the moment, all to his going, to the cell he had heard, but he turned again into the rooms famous over the world and possibly for the last time, talked of his art, its future and especially of the dress of ten years hence.

"The transcendent influence of today," he said, "is the wind of emancipation passing over woman, driving her always toward more masculine forms. It is my impression that the tendency will be more and more in the direction of what is plain and severe, and that clothes will become more and more rational and engender with a view to the practical. In a word, woman's dress will become more and more womanlike and independent."

"I am certain of this change that I have designed a style of trousers for woman and have sealed up the drawings, this seal to be broken in 1924. You shall see then how accurately I have prophesied."

Mme. Darle was given a description of these sketches by one of the master's helpers. The trousers are really a half skirt, separating sharply below the knees. Some of the houffant effects of today have almost a similar optical effect. Then a loose fitting jacket, falling naturally to the lines of the figure, entirely sleeveless and giving opportunity for lively expression in the buttons. Beneath the jacket may be seen the flaps of the waistcoat with long pointed edges.

The collar is of soft linen, turned down with Etonian effect. The tie reminiscent of the Quartier Latin mode, accomplishes the artistic effect without seeking the flowing model. It is a bow, a very feminine bow, called by some a "blossoming bow," and if it were anything less feminine the effect would not be so pleasing. Gauntlet cuffs, conforming to the simplicity of design, are a pictureque touch.

"The costume may be considered almost outlandish to the beholder for the first time," continued Poiret to the prima donna, "merely because it is unaccustomed. But a closer familiarity with it will give it a beauty even in its sombre severity."

"Will they be called trousers? Unlikely word! inept and criminally insufficient when applied to the skirt which gracefully flows into the male form of garment. Panatelaet also fails of the mark—for they describe the long trousers appearing below the skirts and especially applied to their detachable, frilled leg coverings.

"I cannot give a name," he concluded, "that is for another voice, perhaps. I shall only go on record as regards an influence, and if we continue to undergo the influences now in force I feel that we shall be carried irresistibly forward to masculine forms."
